

Reviews about two documentaries

Inside Cadbury chocolate secrets unwrapped

Overall, the video is about the production of the chocolate. It highlights the challenges the company might face in order to keep consumers satisfied.

Students should watch this because it shows business in the real world and it gives an idea to those who want to start their own business what procedures they have to take in order to keep their business alive. The video shows employees coming up with new products that would be added to their product portfolio to keep customers interested in their produce as they try the new products.

What I would have wanted to see is the exports and imports of the products as the product travels around the world to get to the supermarkets due to Cadbury being an international company so their products are sold in every supermarket because it would have been nice to see as people would understand how the chocolate gets to the supermarkets.

The chocolate is made in batches and machines make the shape of the chocolate and put it into the wrapping. Seasonal products are made a couple of months before they are dispatched into shops, for example Easter eggs are made in January so there is time to make enough produce for Easter.

The video was helpful in understanding what it takes to run a large business. It is helpful for A-level because it shows business in the real world and the operations and management in which a business should have.

Overall, I give 4/5 stars

The truth behind the click

The documentary is about the conditions of Amazon's workplaces and how customers feel within the building of Amazon and their working conditions and how ethical the business is.

Students should watch this because it gives those who want to start their own business an understanding that they should be ethical with running their business and therefore should look after their employees and have safe workplaces. It highlights that when running a business there are legal requirements that are put in place in which you have to follow.

I disliked the fact that there was no disclaimer that the documentary was made 3 years ago and therefore Amazon could have changed and it now shows Amazon badly when they now could be ethical.

Amazon's employees hated working for Amazon. They were paid £6.25 an hour or £8.25 for night shifts. They worked 10 hours and were only allowed an hour break. The employees had to run to scan the products otherwise they'll miss that scan and having to run for 10 hours is exhausting. The employees had 3 strikes and after those 3 strikes they would be fired and being off sick counted as half a strike and therefore if you were sick 6 times you would have no job anymore.

I liked this documentary because it is helpful for those doing A-level because it shows what businesses must not do as it is unethical. It shows the importance of being an ethical business because it accounts for a business's reputation.

Overall, I give 4.5/5 stars
